International travel is getting easier — except for the unvaccinated – Harry Nelson Interview by CNBC

Founder and Managing Partner Harry Nelson was interviewed by CNBC regarding loosening entry requirements for vaccinated travelers as there is a growing list of countries reducing or eliminating quarantine and Covid-19 testing requirements for those who have been fully vaccinated while keeping restrictions in place for those who haven't.

From the interview:

> Phuket, Thailand, and Greece have indicated less restrictive vaccine-based protocols are in the works.
>
> Such policies make "perfect sense," said Harry Nelson, the founder of Los Angeles-based health care law firm Nelson Hardiman.
>
> "My anticipation is that this will eventually be the rule in the vast majority of countries and that, at some point in the future … we will see some countries shift to a vaccination requirement," he said.
>
> Are these policies fair? No, said Nelson, "but the complaints about fairness are, in my view, ridiculous."
>
> He cited long-standing precedents for countries imposing proof of vaccinations for visitor entry, particularly with yellow fever. He said that the ongoing threat of Covid-19 variants makes it "fully reasonable for countries to impose vaccination requirements."
>
> "Fair is a concept that is irrelevant when it comes to controlling a highly infectious virus that is transmitted around the world," he said.

Full Article

For Inquiries Contact: info@nelsonhardiman.com