Nelson Hardiman Prevails in Peer Review Matter

Attorneys Sara Hersh and Sarvnaz Miriam Mackin successfully represented the medical staff of an academic medical center in a peer review matter. The results were consistent beginning with the medical staff hearing, the internal appeal, writ proceedings in superior court, and the Court of Appeal, Second Appellate District.

A physician and faculty member with membership and privileges on the medical staff was charged with violations of the medical staff bylaws, HIPAA, CMIA and hospital policies. The physician improperly accessed patients' records in the absence of authorization or patient consent, recruited the assistance of trainees to access the electronic records for the physician's own purposes, and provided access to an outside physician and personal acquaintance who was not authorized to treat, consult or view the records. The physician claimed that he personally sanctioned these actions. He claimed his actions were justified to satisfy his concern for the cause of the patient's condition and for patient safety. He argued his actions fell under the health care operations exception in HIPAA. At all levels of review, it was determined his actions did not fall under the exception and that he could have accessed deidentified records through proper existing channels and sought authorization for a review of the case by subject matter specialists and committees within his academic medical center. The proposed corrective actions by the medical staff were determined reasonable and warranted by the substantial evidence.
